Carlos Castaneda's Teachings Menu Carlos Castaneda (1925 - 1998) Carlos Castaneda was born in Lagos, Venezuela. He was raised in his grandparents' home where his grandmother introduced him to the teachings of Don Juan, a Yaqui Indian, a shaman. It was through his grandmother's teachings that Castaneda learned the art of shamanism. Even though Castaneda attended college, he continued his studies of occultism. He became involved in the theosophy movement. Through theosophy, he traveled the world, meeting some of the world's masters and holding initiation ceremonies. He received his training in shamanism and in healing. Castaneda finally concluded that he had to leave theosophy because it was promoting warfare in the world. He was also concerned by the theosophists' connection with Hitler's Nazism, which he condemned. He decided to further his education in shamanism. In 1950, he began to travel. During a trip through Mexico, the leader of a Yaqui tribe recommended that he go to Mexico to study shamanism. (Castaneda claims this to be Don Juan, the Indian shaman; however, Don Juan is from Peru and was never in Mexico.) In 1953, Castaneda met the Yaqui and was taken to the home of the master (the person who teaches and initiates other shamans) of the Yaqui people. It was during this meeting that Castaneda began to study how the Yaquis make contact with the spirits of the world. He was taught that the spirits of the Yaquis were called mayflies and that they were there to help the people of the world. When Castaneda returned to the United States in 1953, he moved to New York and began his training. However, after three months, Castaneda was told that he had disappointed his teacher. He thought it was because he had forgotten part of the training. He left New York to return home. During his time in Mexico, he had been initiated as a sorcerer and had been given a variety of supernatural powers. He came home and was told that he had also failed to do his training. He decided to go back to New York to finish his training. He did so, and was initiated as a sorcerer. Upon returning to New York, Castaneda began working with

Froome looking strong with Tour lead Related Links Lyon - What a turnaround. Ten days ago, the seemingly out-of-favour Chris Froome was sitting with only a narrow break-away win from the Tour and a stage victory at the Giro d'Italia, which he had also won. Those are both now gone and now it seems just a matter of waiting for Saturday's summit finish in the Alps, with the defending champion now in the strongest position he has ever been in before the Tour de France. If anyone thought Froome was too calm, they were wrong on Wednesday in Saint-Amand-Montrond, where the 25-year-old Briton was already trying to look like a winner, as he prepared to pay homage to fellow Briton David Millar, who died earlier this year. Froome's recent form had made him favourite, but while he had some impressive displays in Spain - as did team-mate Richie Porte - neither man looked like the rider who won stage 17 at last year's Giro. The way the peloton was bunched up in the final 50 kilometres was a reminder of why Froome has remained among the favourites, having been so close on 10 occasions in the past two weeks. Froome's team director, Jonathan Vaughters, said: "It was a nervous time for him because the Tour was beginning to look so good for him. "He didn't really know where he stood with David Millar as he had done the Giro and the Tour and won some races. He wanted to honour David in some way, and I think he did." The names on the pink jersey will keep changing, as there are so many contenders and today is another tough day. Froome won't be separated from the favourites by much, but he can put up with that if he does as well as he has in these final few days. His team principal, Dave Brailsford, said: "I don't think anybody can be in a better position. It is a difficult stage, but he does not need any help from his team, he is the best." The pursuit of the green jersey, which will be decided between Roman Kreuziger, the world road champion, and Irishman Daniel Martin, is one of the main talking points of the evening. Brailsford is confident his man has the best chance. "Roman
