Q: How to set java.util.logging.FileHandler to a file server? I have a Java-based application which I'd like to have logging output sent to a file server (running on another machine on the network) rather than having the program write the log output to the current system's directory. How can I configure java.util.logging.FileHandler so that it is directed to my file server? A: The basic setup is to use the RollingFileAppender:

log4j.appender.file=org.apache.log4j.rolling.RollingFileAppender log4j.appender.file.File=log4j.log

You can also specify the SIZE here (up to the maximum size available). I think you need to specify the retval too. `log4j.appender.file.retval=1` Then when you configure the logger, just use the correct file name:

log4j.logger.yourpackage=DEBUG, file

The really interesting part is the RollingFileAppender section. I don't think there is a better way to have the output of your application direct to a file, but it's complex. From the official docs: The RollingFileAppender is a special appender that always creates a new output file when the old output file has reached a specified size or it has been closed and re-opened. The old output file is not deleted. So in effect it's like an append only file. The benefit of this is that you can have 100% durability, since the old file will be retained, but it is a bit slow since you always have to open and close the file. A: Try using the NDC LevelFilters. Take a look at the following link for further details: Q: What are the terms of How to Train Your Dragon 2? How does Hiccup and Toothless train them in the process of their dragons? And how do they keep training them up and progressing? A: Hiccup kept his animals in his home until Hulqueen gave them to him to raise. In the premiere, Hiccup started with his first dragon,
