A potential role for the brain histaminergic system in mediating the behavioral effects of the novel cognition enhancing drug, pemoline. A non-sedating tri-cyclic antidepressant (TCA) known to be an effective nootropic drug, pemoline, was shown to bind strongly to brain histamine H2 receptors. The possible role of histamine as a mediator of the therapeutic effects of pemoline was investigated in a rodent model of cognition, the radial arm maze. Histamine is known to elevate mood in man, and the histaminergic system has been hypothesized to mediate the effects of pemoline. To test this hypothesis, the effects of pretreatment of rats with the H2 antagonist, cimetidine, the H3 antagonist, thioperamide, the H2 agonist, impromidine, or the H<sub>1</sub> antagonist, pyrilamine, were investigated.
