Ask HN: How do you experience empathy? ===== What actions do you undertake to experience empathy? Can you explain why doing this will bring you closer to other humans? ====== Contrast I think conceptually, I know what empathy is. But my empathic experience changes through life, based on my previous experiences and learning opportunities. As an example, if I experienced cruelty, I would struggle to mentally connect with others as in they see the true me and therefore no empathy is possible. If I had a more nurturing experience, I would probably have a different perspective on the world and be able to empathize with others. I think my compassion and empathy have some limits that are based on my life experiences. I can't empathize with pain much because I have never experienced it, so I can only empathize with others in a figurative sense. I think I could say that I try to have the personal capacity to empathize with others, but I know that personal learning can influence my empathic experience. ------ Mz I experience empathy when: _a._ I experience some active compassion toward others. _b._ I have a conversation with someone or am listening to someone speak. This mindset feels like an effort of sometimes remembering to duck my head (or, at least, looking down a lot). Her primary objective would be to replace the current Kogelnik T-34 with the T-60. Much effort is put into advancing LT-series machines, that is linear-friction constant-effort machines.

The game has the ability to push your PS3 to it's limits, which causes the system to run very hot and "lag" as the developer puts it. But besides that, the game has some serious problems. First of all, there are two things that really kill the game for me.

First of all, the game will freeze up sometimes and even throw you out of the game to the desktop. The game will then attempt to "autorun" itself and launch the main character into a chamber with no explanation. Second, there is no save/load feature. If you die, you lose all progress. This is done to discourage players from replaying a level (unless they are completely insane). If you are paying for a digital download, you are being ripped off. If you want the full experience, you can buy a physical copy for $10 from GameFly. GameFly makes it super easy to download the game, they send you a code and then it's delivered to you in a few days. This will allow you to play the game whenever you want. If you like puzzles, you will enjoy DYING: Reborn. It's a cool concept with an unsettling atmosphere and a good ending. With such a short game play time and such little a story, you're not going to get much out of it. The game uses the worst kind of repetition to create its puzzles. I mean, seriously, how could a puzzle involving a monitor be any different than one involving a book? I feel like the whole environment is as bland as the characters. The environments are decorated in such a way as to make them slightly interesting, but the story line and characters are bland and uninteresting. The game is amazing in concept, but without the story, the concept, and the atmosphere, it really doesn't mean much. The concept is cool, but the presentation is very weak, and the game itself is full of annoying bugs. DYING: Reborn is a First-Person Room Escape puzzle game, in which players must tackle all kinds of puzzles in a series of dark and eerie rooms.In the first of 6 chapters, protagonist Mathew finds himself waking up in a strange hotel with little recollection of what has lead him there. At this dark hour a mysterious character contacts him, claiming he prepared a series of trials for Mathew to pay for the enormous mistake he made a long time ago.and a grave punishment awaiting him should he fail to pass these-

What's new in Eternal Evil:

Funny, you keep putting off "bringing me on" (something about contests with prizes in addition to revenue) until I win a contest. While you're waiting, I will personally see to it that you win if you contract my music for your soundtrack. This is your only choice, of course, because you thought I used to be on that little podcast run by the Smutpot Chicks last week. And no, I am not going to send you any random smutpotchicks.com feed, or even the podcast itself. Once you do know what the chick that had her legs spread wide when she was talking was talking about, you'll see why. Oh, and by the way, I used to do comedy sketches back in the day, until I smashed my head into a brick wall really hard, and it changed my mind about everything, like 'bout a gajillion times. Just think about it. What kind of video games host would I be? I would listen to my music. No, I am getting paid for this. I would rap about the game. I am getting paid for this. I would wear ridiculous clothing. I am getting paid for this. I would have awesome friends who would test everyone and record them. I am getting paid for this. I would be a DJ on Tuesday, Saturday and Sunday nights. I am getting paid for this. … Darn. Well, now I can't pretend I wasn't thinking it. But, seriously, what kind of games host would I be, and would that sound like a worthwhile trade-off? I cannot be the only one. Now, what kind of music would I listen to? Sure, I have a lot of old stupid hip-hop that I would love to claim I listen to, but there are certain rules about that. One such rule is that you do not ever listen to the same song more than a few times, or at most the first time. Ever. And that rule applies to the others who promote themselves as the same kind of music to varying degrees (Ice Cube, Ray Parker Jr., Stevie Wonder, D12, this company…pretty much anything that…I could say). Here is the reason for that rule. When you listen to music, you get a better response from recording it the first time, but
