A sample of 84 nurses were studied. The questionnaire consisted of three parts: the first, social data; the second, stress aspects and coping strategies; and the third, non-stressor related variables. the majority of the participants were women (98.8%) and of low academic degree (77%). The majority was non-smokers (76.0%). The coping strategies employed by the nurses to deal with the stressors were: support from other staff (88.1%), seeking support from superiors (76.0%), seeking support from the immediate superior (47.6%), seeking support from their family (41.0%) and emotional support (39.0%). The stress aspects encountered by the nurses were: work shifts/work schedule (53.3%), workload/work pressure (45.2%), shifts (39.0%), the social environment of work (35.7%) and problems in the work place (29.8%). the nurses that were poorly qualified for working in emergency service reported greater work pressure and less social support. Based on the following coping strategies the nurses deal with the stressors: support from other staff, seeking support from superiors, seeking support from the immediate superior, seeking support from their family and emotional support. When oxygen deprived (hypoxic) cancer cells and several other cell types are stimulated with the complement protein C5a, they move and proliferate, indicating that C5a is a chemoattractant. We have recently found that the C-terminal decapeptide (DPFPE) of C5a is required for this effect. The DPFPE promotes the binding of C5a to the chemokine receptor C5aR (Gp19). We propose to perform a mutational analysis of C5a and DPFPE to assess the contributions of individual amino acids in C5a and DPFPE in promoting the chemotactic response of cancer cells, monocytes
