I was reading up on electricity and current. Why are the power of positive and negative numbers equal to zero? Will this affect the current if we approach the point of zero potential difference between the conductor and the source? A: The power of a negative number is positive. For example, if I double -3, I get -3. If I double -2, I get -4. As for the force of the electron through some other conductor, think of it this way: In the above picture, I have a force of 10 newtons on the conductor for a potential difference of 100 kV. If we were to instead have the conductor (conductor, that is, I) at +100 kV instead, then we would have a force of 10 newtons on the conductor as well (since the electron will have +1.6 meV in potential energy at each point along the conductor). Now, to answer your question: since we have a force of 10 newtons for the same potential difference of 100 kV, but have an electron (charge carrier) moving to the left in a conductor that is tied to +100 kV, there's a current that is decreasing from 10 A to 0 A. However, if we have the conductor tied to +0 kV (the conductor is at negative potential), then there is a -10 newton

I did read up on this program, and I'm really interested in getting it. However, I did something a little unusual by purchasing it at Costco. The thing is, I didn't purchase the full version, only the x64. I went for the "perpetual" version. I also had a question, and I'll be honest, I have no idea if that matters. I went to the site and it had the same download as I got from Costco. I did ask them if it would matter, and they said that that it wouldn't and to proceed with the download. It was the one that was titled "Autocad 2008 LT 2008 X64 (Product Key)" anyway. I don't know if this will matter or matter at all. I really want this program and I thought I'd run with the one
