Amber Rudd, the work and pensions secretary, was quizzed at a select committee about the Windrush scandal. She claimed that the "experience of the UK... would have been different" if the "atmosphere" of Adolf Hitler's regime had been allowed to develop in the run-up to the Second World War. Rudd, who will only to remain in her role if the Tories win the general election, claimed the "atmosphere in terms of this immigration policy" had helped create "the atmosphere in Germany" which "was that they didn't need to take lessons from Nazis". Although some Tories have been critical of the comments, Theresa May has not. Asked about it by Sky News, she said: "I don't think there is any equivalence between what is acceptable and what is not." Jeremy Corbyn: 'It is important that Amber Rudd apologises to Windrush victims' Read more Labour's frontrunner to replace Corbyn as leader, Angela Rayner, described the comments as "an affront to the victims of the Windrush scandal". Diane Abbott, the shadow home secretary, said Rudd's remarks were "shameful" and "inappropriate". She said: "I am sure that if Hitler had been able to set up his apparatus of indoctrination in the 1930s, he would have had the same impact of good he had." The Nazi regime was responsible for the genocide 0cc13bf012
