A surgical technique for treatment of distal urethral stricture by complete surgical excision of a urethral duplication is presented. The technique of partial urethral duplication (PUD) excision was adapted to be applicable to partial urethral duplications. This report reviews the clinical course of 14 cases of spontaneous reduction of PUD following the Kock pouch procedure, aiming to describe the long-term outcome of this method of treatment. Fifty-one patients with at least one PUD underwent cystourethroscopy in the past 17 years. The patients were classified into two groups according to the type of urinary tract fistula: the urethral and bladder fistulae (Group A, N = 18) and the bladder fistulae (Group B, N = 15). Thirty-three patients had a patent urethra with no fistula. In group A, the patients had a mean age of 38.4 years (range: 20-63), and were followed up for a mean period of 49.2 months (range: 6-170). In all patients, urethral strictures were repaired simultaneously at the time of cystourethroscopy. The repaired urethra was fenestrated in 2 patients. The Kock pouch procedure was performed in all 17 patients in group B, and 8 patients were diagnosed with spontaneous reduction of PUD. The mean age of these 8 patients was 32.5 years (range: 21-55), and the follow-up period was 39.5 months (range: 12-96). All 8 patients had a simple bladder fistula and repair was performed through the cy
