Moore St My last meeting with the Transmitter landed me three free tickets to the Heyday!! show at the bar that was formed in my studio that morning. On time, I was welcomed by well wishers and companions. The crowd was equally enthusiastic. Like an audience of end-of-the-world survivors, they were selling anything they could lay their hands on. A heavily fortified flu virus invaded the crowd leaving no one unscathed. The opening bands were surprisingly good. They were quirky Brit rock experimentalists and their intro song played throughout most of the three-hour-long gig. The DJ played their twenty-one minute long song behind the vocalist all the time. At times the singer's voice was drowned out by its DJ counterpart. The feeling was chaotic until Balfa the gargantuan peered out of the void between the speakers and played plaintive vocals. It made me think about dead language and the futility of the human race's destruction. The singer's voice was raised enough that it was clear she was not listening to the mechanical roar. Heyday!! were no psychedelic philosophers and their music contained no echoes of the past. Their songs were aggressive and fierce. I listened to them from beginning to end undaunted by the familiar forms of sound, a sort of radio noise violence. The band were not giving in even when their vocals were drowned out by the DJ. It was enough for me to not only listen to the bands performances but to bask in the sheer rage of their music. Their driving force set off a visceral feeling in me like none before. I have neither seen nor heard such music since. Their energy, passion and raw brilliance inspired awe. When the band emerged out of the deepest trance I turned from my seat on the floor to appreciate their exact moment of triumph. A sinister presence adorned them. A hulking, face was illuminated by the studio lights. Heed the pounding drums. A state of trance and voodoo had settled over the Who. They were more than the living jazz of The Who. That doomy marching rhythm, and Balfa's rumbling guitar, added the dread ritual music of voodoo to the furious guitars of the Who. I had always found the sound of the Who to be too fickle, too restless, not full, not real. The band came out of their trance to bring the monstrous religious implications of the voodoo drums to life. The band with

It is an Enterprise application developed by our company. We have recently signed a new MSDN Subscription. With this change we have to do the following to keep our application running: Recompile the DLL Recompile the project Replace all references to all references to.Net 4.0 framework with.Net 4.5.3 framework Make any other configuration changes needed to keep the solution working on the new machine Question: Can we safely deploy the compiled version over our client's machine and avoid these steps listed above. A: If you already signed a subscription then you're already using.NET 4.5.3 (as the current versions are available through an MSDN subscription). But this does not mean that all of the.NET 4.0 features are still supported by.NET 4.5.3. For example any "new" features you added could not be fully supported. You should also consider compatibility problems that might arise if you reuse your (current) code to target.NET 4.5.3. Anything depending on 4.0 features might break unless you write your code for.NET 4.5.3. Q: join and view attributes I have a relation where users can be friends to each other, and I want to be able to show who friends a specific user is. So I need to join the user
