If you happen to use CC, you also get to enjoy Adobe Portfolio, which works pretty much as it should on the iPad. You get the same photo folders view, in which you can then modify and organize your projects. In some way, it enables you to get a glimpse of Photoshop on the iPad. You can use Portfolio as a gallery, or have it edit photos from the same location on your desktop. Even though Adobe has added third-party apps like Google Docs, this is a very innovative feature, and may appeal to those who want to work on their images and store them in the same places. As I said, I was never really a fan of the Touch Bar in my MacBook Pro 13-inch model. In fact, I even bought a display from SanDisk with one on it. Still, I have tried to live with it for some time. Then, the Touch Bar on the iPad Pro 13-inch model and the potential of Apple's new Pencil got me hooked. I am not sure how long I will make do with the Touch Bar, but in the meantime, I was quite happy with the performance and ease of use of the new Adobe Photoshop CC on the iPad. It doesn't work always with touch precision and sometimes I do have to edit with my fingertips. But while I don't want to use my fingers for everything, I quite like using the Pencil along with the Touch Bar. The actual keys, with their dimensions, work almost as on a laptop. What makes this easier is the fact that the iPad is always actively with me. Once a Photoshop file is open, I sometimes use it primarily in landscape mode to annotate with the Pencil, for example. I use it quite a bit while taking my morning coffee.
