It also unveils the new content capture workflow, which has caught the attention of most Photoshop customers and users. The new workflow provides a brand new way to take an image from the subject that you're taking a picture, and then create a scalable, editable self-portrait-like personal gallery of your own images. And because it's a completely new feature, the process is far simpler than the others - in fact, it's a breeze. With the way Adobe Photoshop CS5.1 and later versions handles images, the new workflow is pretty easy to understand. Like most of the other features that are yet to be mentioned, Autodetect is powerful stuff. It facilitates the process of automatically detecting things on an image. So, for example, if you select an area of a photo and add it to a new layer as a Photoshop filter, you can give that area an intended colour and get the rest of the photo to automatically go according to that colour. After all, the more images you use for detecting something, the better. After you save a new image, you can name it, choose advanced editing, and then apply Snap to automatically center the image on the canvas. Photoshop users are familiar with the CS3 3-point and 4-point snap options that help you align objects to a grid, but this new feature will be welcomed by those who find the options difficult to target. You can also use a Crop box tool for simple, rectangular selection clones. Crop panels in Photoshop offer a new color and black & white selection for selecting objects for cropping. It's simply called the Crop Ctrlr in Layers panel and offers the same function as the Crop Kit tool (image) in the Crop Tool. The Ctrlr panel (image) offers the same tool to change single pixels on a selected layer, but in a more subtle way. You also get a Lock selection to trim the crop to just the object.
