The present article investigates the feasibility of cell-permeable peptide-PEG conjugates for the intracellular delivery of small molecules. We have synthesized cell-permeable peptide-PEG conjugates via the incorporation of a tetrapeptide cationic sequence, followed by the conjugation with a PEG moiety. Several cell-permeable and small molecule-dispersing peptide sequences were obtained, whose efficiency of cell uptake and the intracellular delivery of a fluorescent marker were evaluated. The staining results revealed that the cell-permeable peptide-PEG conjugates are successful in transporting the dye to the nucleus. The potential of the peptide-PEG conjugates as an intracellular delivery vector was further examined with cell-penetrating peptides (CPPs), and the biodistribution of the conjugates was explored by fluorescence-imaging techniques. The results indicate that these new CPPs can efficiently enter the cells and release the model small molecules.
