Devices such as smart phones and tablets have brought information and data connectivity to areas where fixed wired infrastructure is not ubiquitous or not easily accessible. In addition, workers can bring their own devices (BYOD) to work, increasing the potential for data and information leakage. There are many reasons why information and data connectivity at the desktop can be challenging. For example, companies can be tied to a particular desktop operating system because it may have been a long time since the company purchased that operating system and the cost of maintaining it can be high. Similarly, a company may be tied to desktop applications that are owned by another company and are controlled by that company. For example, a company may be tied to its own desktop applications because it is difficult to migrate those applications to a new operating system or a new application platform. Further, migrating those applications to a new platform can be a time-consuming process because the applications are often developed using different programming languages, different software versions, and different file formats. As another example, migrating desktop applications to a new computing environment may result in costly downtime, as the applications may need to be rebuilt to work on the new environment. Further, migrating desktop applications can be time consuming and can be difficult if the computing environment is not yet in place, such as when deploying new devices. Still further, migrating desktop applications is often a manual process.
