For various reasons (mainly politics and his own prodigious company) Jay-Z is not going to play ball this.The present invention relates generally to the field of magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) and, more particularly, to the use of an implantable magnet device for highly localized direct current (DC) or pulsed magnetic fields (PMFs). Such magnet devices can be used in MRI to selectively heat or otherwise magnetically manipulate biological material, such as various nerve cells or muscle cells, for diagnostic, therapeutic, or research purposes. Magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) is a non-destructive technique for generating cross-sectional images of the human body. MRI is based on the principles of nuclear magnetic resonance (NMR) wherein nuclei in a magnetic field are excited to a specific energy state, precess around the magnetic field at their characteristic Larmor frequency. After excitation of the nuclei, the nuclei return to their original energy state, emitting an NMR signal that can be detected. The detected NMR signal is a function of the precessing nuclei and the specific atomic and molecular characteristics of the biological material or tissue from which the nuclei originate. By applying selective excitation pulses in a known manner during free precession of the nuclei and observing the emitted signals, an image of the biological material or tissue can be constructed. MRI is widely used in the medical community, primarily for diagnostic purposes, and is particularly valuable for generating cross-sectional images of the human body. MRI has become a standard imaging technique in the medical community to diagnose many diseases and injuries. Although MRI has many applications, MRI has one basic limitation. Like other NMR techniques, MRI depends on detecting small differences between the natural (i.e., thermal) equilibrium magnetization of a target object and the magnetization of the object before excitation. Typically, the contrast that allows MRI to be used to image soft-tissue structures is based on temperature variations. However, MRI cannot be used to image other types of materials which cannot change their magnetization. Magnetic resonance thermal imaging (MRTI) is a technique that may be used to provide information to the diagnostic and treatment planning processes. MRTI has the potential to provide image-based guidance for minimally invasive and direct interventions. MRTI may be used to non-invasively probe the energetic state of biological materials at a microscopic level. If a material has a high temperature, it will have a higher energy state that normally transitions to a lower energy
