Videos uploaded to YouTube use the LongTail system which allows for better data retrieval, store videos on the web for longer periods of time, store videos on the web for longer periods of time, store videos on the web for longer periods of time, and improve overall search results. The highest scores get uploaded on a regular basis and then are promoted to the front page. Concerns Initially, it appears that the way the search engines work is somewhat glitchy. Some videos that should be at the front page of YouTube actually are not. The problem is, the algorithm does not update the results frequently enough. The technical term is "batch updates" which means that the algorithms update the results only once a week. This results in a long lag time between when a video is uploaded and when it gets promoted. Furthermore, it's possible that videos that have reached the top of the results and are ranked correctly may lose their spot as a result of a technical glitch. Furthermore, the system seems to allow videos that contain sexually explicit language, which are completely inappropriate for children and other sensitive audiences to stay up on the front page of the search results. The second issue is when a video is deemed inappropriate, it won't get noticed by the algorithm and the video will remain on the first page. The way the algorithm works is that it counts the number of upvotes and downvotes for each video. To get a video on the first page of the search results, it must have over 10 upvotes and less than 3 downvotes. Videos with a lot of downvotes usually get removed from the results. How to fix the issues 1. Fix the search algorithm This is probably the simplest fix. Get some programmers to create a script that will keep the video on the front page. Note that it's going to be complex because the search algorithms are complex. Getting the problem fixed would be difficult because there is a delay time when new videos are uploaded and the front page needs to update. 2. 2edc1e01e8
