I tried using the getAttribute('id') method, but it always returns an empty string. A: id attributes must be unique, so you'd get id0 or id1 based on whichever element is clicked and not both. As it says in the spec, the id attribute must return a String. You cannot get an id from an element in the form of an attribute value. If you need to know which element was clicked you will have to use a different approach. You could use a library like jQuery to grab that information for you or hook into the DOM events and identify the clicked element yourself. I would imagine in this case you could simply identify the element based on the text contained within the element, you could grab a reference to the element and get its text, and then split that string to extract the name of the element. What are phrases? What are phrases? What are phrases? We are using the term phrases to refer to words or short groups of words that are used as of a set. Phrases can be formed in several ways, most commonly it is formed by combining different parts of the word. For example "peanut butter", "grandma", and "chocolate" are all formed from a string of words. They have different meanings or meanings are based on context. Example of a phrase: As you probably know, the code for JavaScript is called ECMAScript and not ECMAScript, however, the language developed by some of the major browser companies to implement JavaScript, has recently changed from ECMAScript to ECMAScript 3.0 with versions of ECMAScript 3.0 being used
