The merged workspace is a file that can be turned into a final PSD, merged with a background image, or saved to a new file. This new way to approach larger projects can help your workflow, especially for those with more than one editor.

We’re experimenting with Blended PSDs as a way to speed up a workflow that converges separate, document-based editing sessions, such as when you change a layout and then change your perspective of the page. Blended PSDs can help you create a clean and final version of a PSD more quickly, because you can just create a single, merged PSD that incorporates all your changes in just one editing session. You can even share the merged workspace with others, to ensure editors are working from a consistent set of changes. When you make a selection, whether that’s a perfect portrait, a great panorama or a perfect shot of a model, a 50-image pro-shoot support team will critique your work. You can then post your images for others to rate.

You can quickly choose from a number of pre-sorted 3D models for your content. You can make the best use of it by controlling the shape of the area by using Rectangle and Ellipse tools, you can give an offset like a paper cut and the shape layers would mimic the shape you choose if that papercut was moved. There may be a limit to the size of the object, as a free plug-in can be used to increase its size. However, in this way, the realistic shapes can be used to create a system of multiple computer-drawn objects.
