In PSE 12, Adobe introduced the Two-Painter engine. It might be a bit misleading to call this feature a two-painter. The Two-Painter engine keeps the Painter and Content-Aware-Recomposer tools—the ones responsible for managing local and global color and tonal adjustments, respectively—in PSE 2021 is new. However, it's now a lot quicker to get these tools currently called "Painter" and "Content-Aware-Recomposer" to work as distinct tools capable of working on specific bits of the image at once. Considering that I've been writing about color in small doses for over a decade now, it seems odd to me that two tools would have a name like "Painter" and "Content-Aware-Recomposer," yet instead of smartly reusing the "Local" and "Global" tools we have in Painter and Content-Aware-Recomposer, the tools called "Painter" and "Content-Aware-Recomposer" are essentially the same as they were in previous versions of Photoshop. If this is what the future is like, I can't wait. I've been looking forward to a Photoshop update as soon as it was available. I am very glad that I've been able to do my own preview right here on the PCMag website. *The author, Ryan Knutson, has been a Senior Editor at Gizmodo since 2016.
